News: Harvard Increases Financial Aid

Recently Harvard's President Lawrence Summers announced a new initiative that will encourage students from families of low and moderate income to attend Harvard College. This initiative has four major components: financial aid, recruitment, admissions, and a special program for high school students.

Now parents with incomes below $40,000 will no longer be expected to contribute to the cost of their child's education at Harvard. Also Harvard will reduce the contributions expected of families with incomes between $40,000 and $60,000. The College has earmarked $2 million in new financial aid funds for this program which will take effect in the fall 2004 for all enrolled students, and will benefit more than 1,000 families next year.

As reports widely confirm, the concentration of wealth in America, and the resulting educational disparities from the income gap between rich and poor, have increased sharply over the last generation. In the most selective colleges and universities, children whose families are in the lower half of the American income distribution are underrepresented by 80 percent.

As Summers stated, "Addressing this gap has become more urgent than ever before because our nation's competitiveness depends increasingly on the quality of those who graduate from our nation's universities and colleges. Only by assuring access to everyone can we maximize the quality of our nation's college graduates."
